Bowen House

Bowens

18th century

Private

Beaded joists, wrought nails, and hewn members found among the ruins of this house identify at least a portion of it as an 18th century or very early 19th century house. A two-story fieldstone chimney was made of brick from its shoulders on up. As recently as early this century the Bowen house was an elegant dwelling, including double parlors and a grand staircase.

A log slave quarter once stood at the entrance to the property.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The oldest residents of the neighborhood refer to this as the "Bowen House." Although it is a ruins the property is still owned by the Bowen family. Walter Bowen, was the last to live there according to the Gray sisters who recall that his great grandfather Elijha may have lived there too.

The rubble which survives indicates that this was indeed an early house that stood in the Eighteenth Century. How early in that century is not yet know but among the ruins were observed beaded ceiling joists, rose head nails and extremely long and heavy hewn plates. There were at least two seperate sections to the house having heavy post-and-beam frames. The two seperate frames were literally bolted together at one point by means of an iron strap that was observed joining the two sills on the east end. Each wing had a fireplace that resulted in two massive chimneys on the east end. The beaded ceiling joists were in the north wing. The two story chimney on the east end of this section was made of fieldstone but made of hand-made bricks from the shoulders up.

Measurements have not as yet been made (July 28, 1977) but the chimney and the sills of the north wing can only be described as "massive!"

The Gray sisters recall this house as having had double parlors with beautiful fireplaces and a grand stairs that made it the "show place of the county" during their youth (c. fifty years ago). They also remember that there was a log slave quarters which stood on the public road at the entrance to the property.
